Skin moisturizing creams are typically made by combining oil with water. In order to combine oil with water, an emulsifier is required. Because cream can be an ideal cultural medium for bacteria growth, it becomes necessary to add preservatives. Preservatives may have a brownish tint and odor, therefore fragrances and coloring agents are added. Stabilizers and other chemicals may also be added to enhance the quality of the product and the end result is usually a concoction of chemicals that have no beneficial effect. On the contrary, many of these
